A BUSY WEEK AT EXPRESS OFFICE

Local Express Agent A. W. Custer and his able crew of clerks and assistants have been very busy the past two weeks keeping up with the work during the Christmas rush. The express shipments were by far greater than last year and it has kept three busy in the office, besides the two two-horse wagons that have been delivering and collecting packages in town Mr. Custer has been in the express business for several years and knew what a rush there would be during the holidays and had his work so systematically arranged that there was no confusion or error made during the entire time. Unfortunately, however, he wrenched his back several days before Christmas and was unable to do any of the heavy work, but was alwnys present to see that the business in his office was properly conducted.

Aside from the usual large shipments of the smaller boxes and packages there was nearly sixteen tons of dressed turkeys shipped to the San Francisco markets through this office during the past two weeks. Nearly every day last week wagons were lined up in front of the office, each loaded with dressed turkeys and waiting to unload and weigh in their crates and boxes. Many of these turkeys came from Potter valley, while a few were raised in the Ukiah valley and other neighboring towns. The turkey shipments to San Francisco for the Thanksgiving trade amounted to about ten tons, making a total of twenty-six tons of dressed turkeys that have been shipped from Ukiah during the past two months.

PATIENT SUFFERER RELIEVED BY DEATH

James L. Storer, an old resident of this county, passed away at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Bert Buckeridge, at Point Arena, Sunday, December 19. He was born in Springfield, Illinois, February 1, 1835, and came to California in 1856, settling at Hollister, San Benito county, where he owned a large stock farm. He lived at Hollister for a numer of years and then moved to Shasta county, and in 1897 came to Mendocino county where he has since resided.

Mr. Storer was married in San Francisco to Emma C. Towlan in 1875, and to this union were born four children, Walter and Edgar Storer, Mrs. Clarence Cox of Ukiah and Mrs. Bert Buckeridge of Point Arena, with whom the aged father has lived for the past several years. Deceased had a stroke of paralysis several years ago and since that time has been an invalid. He was a great sufferer and for the past year has been quite helpless, but during all his suffering he uttered no complaint, but bore his burdens with patience and resignation. The funeral services were held at the residence and conducted by Rev. E. E. Robbins, pastor of the Methodist church.—Record.

Mrs. Edwards intended to do her Christmas shopping in the metropolis, but says the stores were all so crowded that a person was lucky to get out of the stores without carrying packages.

Mrs. S. E. Brooks spent a few days in Healdsburg the first of the week visiting friends and relatives.

Mr. and Mrs. G. Grant of San Francisco are spending the holidays with her mother Mrs. J. Cleadenin.

Christmas was well observed by the churches of Hopland, each having a splendid entertainment and Christmas tree. On Thursday evening an entertainment was held at the Christian church, and at the M. E. church, south, on Friday evening. Santa Claus was present on both evenings and the little ones were well remembered.

MENDOCINO, Dec. 30—We wish the Press readers a prosperous New Year. Christmas was a happy day for everyone here. Santa Claus came the evening before and abundantly supplied the needs necessary to make everyone happy. Each Sunday school had a program and tree, which were very much enjoyed by the patrons.

The mill closed down the eve before Christmas for a week. This will give the men a chance to enjoy a vacation, also the machinists time to over-haul the machinery.

The free reading room and gymnasium, furnished by the Good Government League is becoming very attractive under the management of Joe Nichols. Such an institution should be in every American town. Skating is one of the attractions at the gymnasium.

Aldon Milliken, an employe in the U. S. immigration service, has been here for the past month. He has returned to his post at San Antonio, Texas.

Mendocino is proud of the fact that she has no saloons; yet sorry she is compelled to admit that she has a few inhabitants who think they are good citizens yet are so unpatriotic as to violate the laws of our land. The people here feel it is just as great a crime to sell liquor where the law says, "Thou shall not sell," as it is to steal a horse where the law says, "Thou shall not steal." Yet we are not discouraged, every great reform meets with many obstacles, and we hope the entire county will join us.

Almost without an exception, the farmers of this section got their crops in early last fall and are now encouraged in seeing the grain from three to six inches tall. Feed is splendid; demand for lumber good, and everything points to 1910 being the banner year. A. J.

FIRST ORATORIO DRAWS FULL HOUSE

The first production by the Oratorio society at the Baptist church Sunday evening was greeted by a crowded house, and in fact a large number were unable to get even standing room and were turned away. The musical program was exceptionally fine and the solos were highly appreciated. The oratorio was entitled the "Holy City;" about fifty voices participating under the direction of Dr. J. D. Maddrill. Mrs. John Hoffman acted as accompanist.

The society had prepared beautiful souvenir programs for the occasion which were presented to those in attendance. It is being urged that the oratorio be repeated to give those a chance to hear it who were unable to gain admission. It is also safe to say that any future production by the society will be well attended.

WAS PINCHED FOR SEINING IN BIG RIVER

Fred Seymour, the Noyo fisherman, who has fished in the streams of the coast for thirty years, was arrested by A. L. Reynolds, deputy fish and game warden, at 4 o'clock Tuesday morning on the river. Reynolds had several all-night vigils on the river before his efforts were rewarded. Seymour was found with his seine across the river and plenty of fish in the net.

He was taken before Justice Murray Tuesday and plead guilty and was fined $10, which he paid. Owing to the man's age and it being the first time he had ever been arrested, the minimum fine was imposed. The maximum fine is $50, or five to twenty-five days in the county jail, or both fine and imprisonment.—Mendocino Beacon.

GREAT MAN EITHER WAY

We are fain to remark that Dr. Cook, the explorer, is a great man, however his north pole trip pans out. If he reached the pole he outdid Sir John Franklin, Melville, Greely, Peary, Nanson, Andre and all the rest of the bunch. If he didn't get there he clearly outclasses Baron Munchausen, Marco Polo, Gulliver, Cagliostro, Ananias, P. T. Barnum and the Dispatch-Democrat's political forecast. Whichever way you look at it Cook is a great man.—Point Arena Record.

RETURNS AFTER VACATION

Agent Johnson, at the Northwestern Pacific depot, has returned after spending his vacation of several weeks visiting in the southern part of the state. For several years Mr. Johnson has been the champion checker player among the railroad boys, but alas he has been defeated and Mr. Arndt has carried the championship away to his home in San Mateo.

CHRISTIAN CHURCH NOTICE

Services at this church on last Lord's day were characterized by earnestness and devotion. The pastor spoke on the importance of taking sides on all ethical and religious matters. The music was good. On next Sunday the pastor will speak on "Appreciation" and at the evening services on "The Saviour's Teaching concerning Love and Hatred."

A. W. Biggers of Fort Bragg was in town Thursday morning for a short time. He has just completed repairing the Noyo river bridge and is now beginning work on the bridge across Hare creek. This will be a large structure and several months' time will be required to build it.—Mendocino Beacon.

RAILROAD OUTFITS ARRIVE AT WILLITS

Materials are arriving daily for the construction of the new railroad down the outlet. As was stated in these columns a few weeks ago, the contract for building ten miles of the road was let to Willis & Burr, San Francisco contractors. It now seems that these people do not intend building any of the road, but have sub-let their contract in divisions. It is stated that between Willits and the Fisher place there will be three tunnels, one 300 feet, one 400 feet and the other 600 feet long.

The Van Hisen and Graham-Nicholson companies have adjoining contracts near the Disher ranch. In talking with J. C. Arnold, who is treasurer of the Graham-Nicholson company, and who is representing the Van Hisen company, he said: "We want to set our camp on the Disher ranch if possible and hope to have carpenters at work next Monday putting up our buildings. We will get to work as soon as our buildings can be put up and our camp made ready."

They expect to build three buildings at present and will employ about sixty men until next spring, when they will build a tent city and will employ one hundred additional men and rush the work through to completion. Their equipment and camp supplies came up from below the first of the week and sixteen head of stock came up on Thursday afternoon. Other companies will probably be coming in as spring draws near to get ready for a good summer's work—Herald.

W. S. PALMER, General Manager.
J. J. GEARY, Gen. Pass. Ag

brought out by the questions asked by Rouletabille of M. Darzac.

When they reached Bourg our travelers learned that on account of an accident on the line at Culoz the train would be delayed for an hour and a half. M. and Mme. Darzac alighted and took a stroll on the platform. Darzac while talking with his wife mentioned the fact that he had forgotten to write important letters before leaving Paris. Both entered the buffet, and Darzac asked for writing materials. Mathilde sat beside him for a few moments and then remarked that she would take a little walk through the station while he finished his letters.

"Very well," replied Darzac. "As soon as I have finished I will join you."

From that point I will quote Darzac's own words.

"I had finished writing," he said, "and I arose to go and look for Mathilde when I saw her approaching the buffet pallid and trembling. As soon as she perceived me she uttered a shriek and threw herself into my arms. 'Oh, my God,' she cried, 'oh, my God!' It seemed impossible for her to utter any other words. She was shaking from head to foot. I tried to calm her, and I begged her to take some restorative. Her teeth chattered as though she had an ague. At length she told me that she had started to walk about the station, but that she had not dared to go far lest I should finish my writing and look for her. Then she went upon the platform, when she noticed the sleeping car porters making up the bed in a berth near our own. She remembered immediately that her night traveling bag, in which she had put her jewels, was standing unlocked, and she decided to go and lock it up without delay. She entered the car, walked down the corridor and came to the glass door of the compartment reserved for her. She opened the door and instantly uttered a cry of horror. No one heard her, for there was no one in that part of the car, and a train which passed at that moment drowned the sound of her voice with the clamor of the locomotive. What had happened to alarm her?

"The little door opening upon the dressing cabinet was half drawn toward the interior of the section, cutting off diagonally the view of whoever might enter. This little door was ornamented by a mirror. There in the glass Mathilde beheld the face of Larsan."

CHAPTER IV.

"She Will Go Mad Again!"

"WHEN she had told me these things," Darzac continued, "my first care was to try to convince her that she was laboring under some hideous delusion. Wasn't Larsan dead and buried? I offered to accompany Mathilde at once to the compartment in order to prove to her that she had been the victim of a hallucination. She was bitterly opposed to the idea, crying out that neither she nor I must ever enter the compartment again. She said that she remembered Larsan's face perfectly—that it had appeared before her twice under such circumstances as would impress it indelibly upon her memory, even if she were to live for a century—once during the strange scene in the gallery and again at the moment when they came into her sickroom to place me under arrest. And then, now that she knew who Larsan was, it was not only the features of the secret service agent that she had recognized, but the dreaded countenance of the man who had pursued her for years.

"She cried out that she could swear on her life and on mine that she had seen Ballmeyer—alive in the glass, with the smooth face of Larsan.

"I explained to the superintendent that my wife had been frightened at something she fancied that she had seen while alone in our compartment, and I begged him to keep her in his office while I went myself to discover what it was that she had seen.

"And then, my friends," continued Robert Darzac, his voice beginning to tremble, "I left the superintendent's office, but I had no sooner got out of the room than I went back and slammed the door behind me. I, too, had seen Larsan. My wife had had no illusion. Larsan was there in the station upon the platform outside that door. He was there in front of the superintendent's door, standing under a gas jet. Evidently he expected us and was waiting for us. He made no effort to hide himself. On the contrary, any one would have declared that he had stationed himself there for the express purpose of being seen.

"Mathilde was staring at me, her great eyes wide open, speechless, as though she were a somnambulist. In a moment, however, she came back to herself sufficiently to ask me whether it were far from Bourg to Lyons. At the same time she begged me to give orders about our baggage and asked me to accede to her desire to rejoin her father as soon as possible. I immediately entered into her plans. Besides, now that I had seen Larsan with my own eyes, I knew well that the long honeymoon trip which we had planned must be given up, and, my dear boy," went on Darzac, turning to Rouletabille, "I became possessed with the idea that we were running the risk of some mysterious danger from which you alone could rescue us, if not already too late. Mathilde was grateful to me for the readiness with which I fell in with her wish to join her father when I told her that in a few minutes we would be on board the 9:29 train, which reaches Lyons at about 10 o'clock, and we discovered that we would overtake M. Stangerson himself at that point. I will pass over his amazement when he beheld us upon the platform of the station at Lyons. Mathilde explained to him that on account of a serious accident which had closed the line at Culoz we had decided to join him and spend a few days with him at the home of Arthur Rance and his young wife, as we had before been entreated to do by this friend."

I here interrupted M. Darzac's narrative to recall to the memory of the reader of "The Mystery of the Yellow Room" the fact that Arthur William Rance had for many years cherished a hopeless devotion for Mlle. Stangerson, but had at last overcome it and married a beautiful American girl who knew nothing of the mysterious adventures of the professor's daughter.

After the affair at the Glandier and while Mlle. Stangerson was still a patient in a private asylum near Paris, where the treatment restored her to health and reason, we heard one fine day that Rance was about to wed the niece of an old professor of geology at the Academy of Science in Philadelphia. Those who had known of his luckless passion for Mathilde and had gauged its depths by the excess with which it was displayed believed that Rance was marrying in desperation and prophesied little happiness for the union. They were living at Rochers Rouges in the old castle on the peninsula of Hercules.

"When we had given these explanations to M. Stangerson my wife and I saw that he seemed to understand very little of what we had said, and he appeared very mournful. Her father saw that something had happened since we had left him which we were concealing from him. Mathilde began to talk of the ceremony of the morning, and in that way the conversation came around to you, my young friend"—and again Darzac addressed himself to Rouletabille—"and I took the occasion to say to M. Stangerson that since your vacation was just beginning at the time that we were all going to Mentone you might be pleased with an invitation that would give you the chance of spending your holiday in our society. There was, I said, plenty of room at Rochers Rouges, and I was certain that M. Arthur Rance and his bride would extend to you a cordial welcome. While I was speaking Mathilde looked gratefully at me and pressed my hand tenderly. Thus it hapened that when we reached Valence I had M. Stangerson write the dispatch which you must have received. While her father rested in his compartments next to ours Mathilde opened my traveling bag and took out my revolver, saying, 'If he should attack us you must defend yourself.' Ah, what a night we passed! I longed to console her, to comfort her, but I found no words. And when once I attempted to speak she made a gesture so full of misery and desolation that I realized that I would be far kinder if I kept silence."

This was Darzac's story. We felt, Rouletabille and myself, that the narrative was so important that we both resolved on arriving at Mentone that we would write it down from memory. At the station of Mentone Garavan they found Arthur Rance, who was astonished at beholding the bride and bridegroom. But when he was told that they intended to spend a few days with him he was delighted. Arthur Rance had not, even after his marriage to Miss Edith Prescott, been able to overcome the extreme reserve with which Darzac had always treated him.

So far as Darzac was concerned, the terror which he felt was increased by news brought to us by Arthur Rance when he met us at Nice. But before this there had occurred a little incident which I cannot pass by in silence. As soon as we reached the Nice station I had jumped from the train and hurried into the telegraph office to ask whether there was any message for me. A dispatch was handed to me, and without opening it I went back to Darzac and Rouletabille.

"Read this," I said to the young reporter.

Rouletabille opened the envelope and read:

"Brignolles has not been away from Paris since April 6. This is an absolute certainty."

Rouletabille then said:

"Well, what does this amount to now that you have it?"

"It was at Dijon," I rejoined, vexed at the attitude of the lad, "that the idea came to me that Brignolles might be concerned in the misfortunes crowding upon us and of which warning was given by the telegrams you received. I wired a friend to make inquiries in regard to the movements of the fellow."

"Well," said Rouletabille, "you have your inquiries answered. Are you willing to admit now that Brignolles is not and has never been Larsan in disguise?"

"I never thought of any such thing as that!" I exclaimed. I suspected that Rouletabille was laughing at me.

The truth was that the idea had actually entered my mind.

And this time both Darzac and Rouletabille begged my pardon and paid their respects to my despised intuitions. I mention this incident here to show to how great an extent I was haunted by the image of Larsan hiding under some new form and lurking unknown among as. Dear heaven! Larsan had so often proved his genius in this respect that I felt him quite capable of defying us now and of mingling with us perhaps even as a friend.

I was soon to change my ideas, however, and to believe that this time Ballmeyer had altered his usual tactics, and the unexpected arrival of Arthur Rance was to go far in leading me to this opinion. Instead of hiding himself, the bandit was showing himself openly with an audacity that staggered belief. After all, what had he to fear in this part of the country? He was aware that neither Darzac nor his wife would be likely to denounce him. His bold revelation of his presence seemed to have but one end in view, that of ruining the happiness of the couple who had believed that his death had opened the way for their marriage.

But now let me tell you of the news brought by Rance when he joined the three of us at Nice. He knew nothing of what had happened at Bourg, nothing of the appearing of Larsan to Mme. Darzac on the train and to her husband in the station. But, if we had retained the slightest hope that we had lost Larsan on the road to Culoz, Rance's words obliterated it. And he had come to warn us.

"After taking you to the station," said Rance to Darzac, "and the train had pulled out, your wife, Stangerson and myself thought that we would leave the carriage for a little while and take a stroll. Stangerson gave his arm to his daughter. I was at the right of M. Stangerson, who, therefore, was walking between the two of us. Suddenly we paused to let a tram car pass. A man said to me, 'I beg your pardon, sir.' The voice made me tremble. I knew that it was Larsan. He cast a long, calm look upon us. I do not know how I kept from crying aloud his miserable name. Happily Stangerson and Mme. Darzac had not seen him. I made them walk around the garden and listen to the music in the park, and then we returned to the carriage. Upon the sidewalk in front of the station there was Larsan. I cannot understand how Stangerson and Mme. Darzac could have helped but see him"—

"Are you sure that they did not see him?" interrupted Darzac.

"Yes. I feigned illness. We got into the carriage and ordered the coachman to drive as fast as he could. The man stood on the sidewalk, staring after us with his cruel eyes as we drove away."

"And you are certain that my wife did not see him?" repeated Darzac.

"Certain, I assure you."

"But, good God, Darzac," interposed Rouletabille, "how long do you think you can deceive your wife as to the fact that Larsan has reappeared and that she actually saw him? At the time you reached Garavan your wife sent me the telegram I am going to ask you to read." And he held out to M. Darzac the paper which bore the two words, "Save us."

Darzac read it, with whitened face.

"She'll go mad again," he said.

MEMORIAL TO THE INDIAN.

Giant Statue Planned For New York Harbor by Rodman Wanamaker.

In the grand ballroom at Sherry's, in New York, the other night Rodman Wanamaker, son of John Wanamaker, tendered a dinner to Colonel William F. Cody (Buffalo Bill) which will be long remembered by those who attended. It was suggested during the evening that a statue of an American Indian, with arms outstretched in welcome to the world and matching in size the Liberty statue, be placed in New York harbor at the Hudson's mouth. The memorial will be erected by Rodman Wanamaker, son of John Wanamaker. Colonel Cody voiced the proposition, and it was indorsed by General Nelson A. Miles, General Leonard Wood and General Horace Porter.

It was a distinguished company that listened to Colonel Cody after he was presented by the toastmaster, Job E. Hedges. They applauded the colonel, who, with a bow to Sioux Chief Ironshell and his son Henry, dressed in their war togs and feathers, first paid tribute to the great service rendered by Mr. Wanamaker in sending expeditions to the far west for the collection of historical material so that the vanishing red man should not go down in history with the real virtues of his great race unknown and unappreciated.

"Mr. Wanamaker has not told me what he intends to do for the Indian," said Colonel Cody. "I know the value of his expeditions, but I believe he has in mind some further way of perpetuating the character of the race. I have an idea that the work now begun means a monument in the harbor as big as Liberty or bigger of an Indian with hands extended in welcome.

"I have known the red man since I was a baby. I have known him on the warpath and in peace, and I have known him to be always honorable in peace or war. He has been driven back over the country of which he once was lord. I have seen the bones of white men on Indian land, but never have I seen the bones of Indians on white men's land."

General Miles, old Indian fighter and friend of Buffalo Bill, praised his scout and told stories of the plains. General Porter, who crossed the continent before the days of the first transcontinental railroad, said he had found Buffalo Bill the most reliable scout in the country, and Cody always knew where the best grass, water and whisky could be had.

Within Her Means.

A pretty little girl of three years was in a drug store with her mother. Being attracted by something in the showcase, she asked what it was. The clerk replied, "That is a scent bag."

"How cheap!" replied the little girl, "I'll take two!"—Lippincott's.
